Course Outcomes

At the completion of this course, the student should be able to:

- Analyze historical and contemporary theoretical perspectives and practical applications of the body of research on human sexuality.
- Practice self-reflexivity exercises that stimulate evaluation of personal belief systems and attitudes toward sexuality and gender in light of contemporary interdisciplinary research and writings on human sexuality.
- Examine how diverse sexual belief systems created by intersections of race, ethnicity, class, gender, sexual orientation, religion, ability, and nation influence the expression of human sexuality in families, intimate relationships, and societies.
- Apply knowledge gained from contemporary psychological research and online resources to case studies handled by helping professionals and to debate controversial issues related to sexual practices and ethics, biotechnology, and their impact on the development of individuals and families across the world.
